Wesleyan University offers an intensive Summer Session in which students can complete semester-long courses in only five weeks. Two sessions are offered, in June and July. Course topics may include biology, chemistry, creative writing, government, and more. All courses have limited enrollment, preserving the small seminar style and opportunity for close relationships with faculty and fellow students that are the hallmarks of a Wesleyan education. Campus housing is available for both sessions.

Students who are considering a lighter course load in a future term, thinking of graduating in three years, or who simply wish to put their winter break to good use may want to make a Winter Session course part of their academic plan. Students complete reading and writing assignments before arriving on campus for the two-week session in January. Classes meet on a compressed schedule in the weeks prior to the beginning of the spring term. In this intensive one-course experience, students gain meaningful insight into their course material and build close connections with faculty and peers.
