The Conservative Movement in the United States since 1945

“The Liberals now dominate all the cultural channels in this country.
If you break completely with this dominant atmosphere, you’re a dead duck.”
-- Philip Rahv, editor of Partisan Review, to co-editor William Barrett, early 1950s

“National Review is out of place, in the sense that the United Nations and the League of Women Voters and the New York Times . . . are in place. It is out of place because, in its maturity, literate America rejected conservatism in favor of radical social experimentation….
It stands athwart history, yelling Stop . . .” — William F. Buckley, Jr. November 1955

"So inevitable, yet so unexpected," Alexis de Tocqueville declared in 1856, referring to the French Revolution of 1789. The same is true of the conservative movement which emerged in the United States in response to the New Deal, a movement with worldwide importance that caught even shrewd intellectuals by surprise.

What was the nature of the American conservative movement? When, how, and why did it emerge? What were its social, cultural, and geographic bases? How did conservative thinking evolve in America over time? What sort of variations and conflicts existed within the movement? How does modern American conservatism compare to earlier varieties of conservatism in the U.S. and to conservative parties in other Western nations? Is it correct to refer to the Reagan administration as a “revolution”? If so, why? If not, why not? Finally, did Donald Trump and his administration represent a continuation of modern American conservatism? If not, why did so many conservatives support him?

These are among the principal questions considered in this seminar. Reading will be substantial and will include many primary sources.

Ground Rules

1. I selected readings that are informative and intended to provoke conversation. Class participation will count significantly toward the final grade.

2. Each student will select five of the seven sessions for which to send me an essay on Moodle responding to one of the questions on the attached page or to a question which they devised themselves. In either case, the essays should integrate materials from several readings and put the subject in its historical context. Essays will be evaluated for clarity, insight, and accuracy.

The essays should be double-spaced, in a size-12 font. Paginate your document. No paper will be accepted that is longer than 1,200 words. Footnotes should accord with the format set out in Kate Turabian’s Student Guide to Writing College Papers, Andrea Lunsford’s Easy Writer: A Pocket Reference, or the Chicago Manual of Style.

3. For the remaining two weeks in which you are not writing an essay, submit several questions—perhaps three, four, or five; more if you prefer—which you would like to discuss in class and/or afterwards. Or you may send several quotations from the readings which you find intriguing, confusing, or wide of the mark. Write one paragraph offering a tentative response to any one of those questions or quotations. Please send these responses to me via email on Friday by 11 a.m.

4. Regardless of whether they submit an essay or quotations to discuss, students should come to class prepared to discuss all of the questions listed on the attached page for that week.

5. All written work, both short essays and suggested discussion questions, will be graded. Your lowest grade will be erased.

6. My office hours are on Thursdays, 2:30-4 p.m. Email me ahead of time to make an appointment to talk on Zoom or telephone. If you have class or work during my office hours, send me an email before 6 p.m. and I will respond.

7. On Friday, February 26, we will meet from 1:30-3:30 p.m., rather than starting at 2 p.m.

Anchor Texts

All of these books will be on E-Reserve in Olin Library. They also can be purchased at the Wesleyan R. J. Julia Bookstore and on-line booksellers. Second-hand, less expensive copies of all of the older books should be available for sale. If you are going to buy only two of the readings, I’d recommend Schneide’s and Allitt’s, since we will be using them almost every week.

The other assigned readings—primary documents, scholarly articles, and book chapters—will be available on E-Reserve. The password to E-Reserve is CSS340.
