How do first generation students uniquely benefit from study abroad?

By Erin Oppenheim

You're the first in your family to go to college and now we want you to (possibly) be the first in your family to travel abroad? We know it sounds a little crazy.

Your first priority is simply to navigate your collegiate career successfully, be the first in your family to do so, and get. That. Paper. Studying abroad might not even break the top 10 most important things for you to accomplish during your time at school, but we think it should be. There are so many long term benefits to studying abroad and first gen students uniquely benefit from this experience.

Expand your studies—keep earning academic credits

You've already taken one huge step out of your comfort zone—you should take another one. Don't worry, contrary to popular belief studying abroad isn't actually time "off" and you won't just be taking blow off electives.

You'll still earn academic credits and you'll be taking classes that fit into your major, and broaden your understanding of any given field or topic. You'll feel newly invigorated about your studies, and that much more motivated to make it across the stage and get your diploma.

Travel is a benefit in itself

You might be the first person in your family to travel internationally. Becoming comfortable with traveling and all that it entails (transportation, accommodations, booking activities, finding the top things to do, etc.) can seem impossible when you have a zillion tabs open on your computer and plenty of other things to think about like... school, work, and family.

But, with your skills in time management and budgeting, the process becomes less arduous the more you do it. So, traveling really isn't as hard as you might think it is.

You'll also have the opportunity to learn about yourself and your home country in a new context. It will make you more appreciative of where you come from, and more prone to continue exploring.

Learn another language

This benefit seems like a given. Learning multiple languages changes how you see the world and makes you realize what a small sliver of information you have access to on the whole. Whether you’re picking up a second, third, or even FOURTH language, the more ways you have to say “hello” the more doors will open for you in the future.

Career & résumé boost

Remember those doors we just mentioned? Well, a whole world of opportunity opens up in your career if you study abroad. International experience on your resume is like gold dust for potential employers—it makes you stand out among hundreds of applicants.

You’ll have more job opportunities come your way, your future salaries will be higher, and you’ll have a grasp on where you want to go and what you want to do in life. Studying abroad as a first generation student shows that you are dedicated to your studies, independent, resourceful, adventurous, internationally minded, and appreciate diversity.

Make your family proud

Not to get all sentimental, but going to college is a huge step for you and your family. They’re already so proud of you and what you can and will accomplish—study abroad included. You're one of their best accomplishments, so studying abroad will only serve to make them even more proud of you as you venture off across the world and keep building a life and career. Make your mark on the world for your family back home. It will mean the world to you and them.

A lot of times, studying abroad impacts our lives in ways that we can’t even begin to imagine. You’ll just have to find out for yourself!

Keep reading this Ebook to make your study abroad dreams a reality.
Believe it or not, studying abroad isn’t something that just happens, it takes a lot of preparation and background knowledge. While you don’t need to know absolutely everything, navigating all that needs to be done before going abroad can be very overwhelming. Behind the scenes you have providers organizing trips, reading applications, and filling out visas. While you’re trying to decide where exactly you want to go and if your credits will transfer.

The process of figuring out how study abroad works is similar to shopping. You browse and look at all your options. While you naturally want to buy or explore everything, there always one thing. Decision to study abroad is never hard, it’s just narrowing down your options. With so much to do and so many to explore, where is an ambitious traveler supposed to start?

If reading this was any indication, you are certainly in the right place and off to a great start. So let’s get down to it, how do study abroad programs work? What are the ways to study abroad?

1. With a provider

While the term study abroad makes you think of educational institutions like high school or college, these are not the only places where you can find programs. Providers like IES Abroad, API, and CEA Abroad have worked for years to provide top-notch programs all around the world. While some providers have partnerships with American universities most third-party providers work alone and dedicate their efforts to providing all the support necessary for their travelers. Associated costs for the trip which can include flight, lodging, and food are given directly to the program but always make sure to see what the program includes since they can vary. Some third party providers also offer scholarships through their programs to lower the cost.

Pros: You don’t have to worry about a thing! The greatness of study abroad providers is that they support you every step of the way, from taking care of your needs before you leave, having support on-site, and even when you return from your trip.

Cons: Your trip is planned from start to finish. Provider programs are very organized, so your schedule, trips and excursions are all pre-planned for you. This leaves little time to explore the country and culture on your own terms. Of course, you’ll have a good time (they are the experts, after all), but if you love independent adventures on a whim or if you’re looking for a more personalized experience, a provider wouldn’t be your fave option.

2. Through your university

The old faithful of the group, studying through your university offers a familiar path to your international learning experience. Choosing between Fall, Spring, or a Summer semester, you have the freedom to choose what’s best for your academic schedule. For the cost of tuition, you can travel with familiar faculty and classmates to have an intimate learning experience abroad. Bonus: Your scholarships and financial aid might carry over to help alleviate your study abroad expenses, too! On top of familiar faces, university programs also guarantee support and transferrable credits that won’t be questioned (so you won’t be worried about taking classes that don’t count).

Pros: Your financial aid is transferable! If you’re traveling during the fall and spring semesters, your regular financial aid rewards can go toward your travels. So take a semester abroad and get out of the college bubble (your university can pay for it). The old faithful of the group, studying through your university offers a familiar path to your international learning experience. Choosing between Fall, Spring, or a Summer semester, you have the freedom to choose what’s best for your academic schedule. On top of familiar faces, university programs also guarantee support and transferrable credits that won’t be questioned (so you won’t be worried about taking classes that don’t count).

Cons: While really diving into the culture is necessary to adjust and really get the most out of your exchange, culture shock is real, and it stinks. The unfamiliarity of everything can be overwhelming. It’s definitely a downer at first but keep your head up and you’ll transition eventually.

3. Through an exchange

Ah, so you want the chance to be the cool exchange student, eh? Well, it’s possible. Take matters into your own hands and apply directly to the international school of your dreams. Dive into a new education system and see what they have to offer. Whether you’re living in an apartment or a homestay on a university campus like other students—your exchange experience is a great glimpse at student life and real life in your country of choice. So save up and take part in an experience to broaden your horizons. The National Student Exchange is a great site to start researching placements and programs.

Pros: New international friends and experiences to broaden your perspective. Living with a host family and interacting with local students give you a glimpse of other issues affecting the world and can show such issues outside of an American context.

Cons: While really diving into the culture is necessary to adjust and really get the most out of your exchange, culture shock is real, and it stinks. The unfamiliarity of everything can be overwhelming. It’s definitely a downer at first but keep your head up and you’ll transition eventually.

4. At a language school

Become a multi-linguist genius in one semester or year with a language school program. While there are of ways to study abroad and boost your language proficiency on this list, these programs are the most committed to upping your language skills. Learn the proper writing, dialects, grammar, and even casual lingo of the language of your choice and become more confident. So choose a language, find a program, and go!
Pros: With the variety of language schools out there, you can grasp the language beyond the textbook. Practice with locals and in-class conversations to increase your fluency. With your mastery, you’ll have a skill that’s a true asset and is applicable in real life situations. The gift of language is the gift that keeps on giving.

Cons: Brain overload. For most intensive programs, you will only be allowed to speak that language during the length of that program. So you might feel stressed out and tempted to compare yourself to other students in your program; However the purpose of these programs is to learn. So while it’s gonna be intense, learn at your pace and dig a little deeper.

5. Through a government program, like Fulbright

The Department of State funds a number of programs for students to study abroad. Promoting diplomacy and cultural exchange these funded programs come at a lower cost. While the famous Fulbright program is the flagship program and the most competitive to study abroad. You have flexible choices. Other famous government program to look at include the Benjamin Gilman Scholarship Program, the Peace Corps and the People to People Ambassador Program.

Pros: You can make an impact. While every program has a different focus, you can conduct research and use their time abroad to tackle and assist global issues.

Cons: For programs like the Peace Corps, and the Fulbright program your time abroad isn’t your typical year or semester. These programs have a mandatory two year commitment for you to participate. If this is too long to be away from home or you envisioned a shorter study abroad experience. These programs won’t be your cup of tea.
